Ecotourism is defined as "Responsible travel to natural areas that conserves the environment and improves the welfare of local people" (TIES, 1990). Ecotourism is about uniting conservation, communities, and sustainable travel. This nature-based classification of tourism is now a major component of global tourism. At the beginning of the 1990s, ecotourism has been growing 20% - 34% per year. According to UNWTO, in 2004, ecotourism was growing globally 3 times faster than the tourism industry as a whole.

Tourism is an excellent vehicle to transfer income from developed countries to developing countries. Ecotourism is especially effective in this transfer since travellers often venture into remote and economically disadvantaged regions. The benefits of ecotourism flowing to local businesses are also dramatically higher than those from mass tourism. Standard all-inclusive package tours typically deliver just 20 per cent of revenue to local companies, while airlines, hotels and large tour companies capture the rest.

Creating memorable experiences for visitors is crucial to ensure that they remember to come back when the opportunity arises. It is therefore important for a destination to maintain its attractiveness and to constantly create new appeal to ensure its sustainability in the market.

It is our responsibility to manage it in a sustainable manner and translate this expansion into real benefits for all countries, and particularly, to all local communities, creating opportunities for jobs and entrepreneurship and leaving no one behind. Managing and sustaining tourism destinations and products require a holistic approach and it must be a collective effort by all the industry players and stakeholders to ensure that all the initiatives put forward brings positive impact and benefit the industry. Various factors need to be considered and risks need to be calculated especially when it involves huge financial implications. The industry needs to be able to adapt to the changing trends and find the best strategy to mitigate issues associated with destinations and products development to remain competitive.
